Summary:

Nicotine-free generation legislation, also known as tobacco-free generation policies, aims to eliminate tobacco use initiation by preventing the sale of tobacco products to individuals born after a specified date. This approach, in essence, signals that there is no safe age for tobacco product use. The goal is to create a future generation where tobacco use is not a viable option.

Here's a more detailed breakdown:

Key Principles:

Prevention of Initiation:

The core focus is on preventing the first time a person uses any tobacco product, including cigarettes, e-cigarettes, and other nicotine products.

Age-Based Restriction:

The legislation defines a specific cut-off birth date, and sales of tobacco products are prohibited to anyone born after that date.

"Endgame" Strategy:

Some view this as a final step in tobacco control, a way to gradually eliminate tobacco use over time.
